A strange case indeed. An elf and robot? Impossible!

A private eye battles an unhinged business empire where murder is popping up like daffodils.

It all began when a security guard, on the graveyard shift, took an elevator down into the cavernous chambers below a massive theme park complex.

"What's going on down here?" the guard called out when he saw someone lurking in the shadows.

The next morning, reporters and TV news crews converged on the rural NY town, after the guard's dead body had been found under a 30-foot Christmas tree in the resort's Santa's Village shopping area.

The press conference went live across the country on the 24/7 news networks. The private eye took a seat with the reporters. He looked around at the TV cameras and shook his head.

These media people were saying it was all an accident. But the detective could see that it was murder. And whoever the crazy maniac was, they were still at large. Could the private eye stop them before anyone else was killed?

In a post-truth world, up is down, and down is up.

A small child stumbled over the body:

"There he is," the little 4-year-old girl pointed. Across the atrium, the theme park's Santa Claus was sitting down on a big golden throne, surrounded by eight “helpers.” Some were elves, dressed mostly in green, and others were just Santa’s regular North Pole assistants, dressed in red velvet outfits with white furry fringes. Soft Christmas melodies were wafting through the air.

The little girl broke away from her mother’s hand, and dashed towards the Santa outpost. But as she veered around the Christmas tree, a beautifully decorated 30-foot high pine tree, she tripped over something sticking out from under its branches.

“Stop running!” the mother shouted.

The little girl picked herself up, dusted herself off, and replied, “I’m okay, mommy.”

She turned around to see what she had tripped over.

And screamed.

It was a high-pitched blood curdling shriek that rang out through the building, echoing through the rafters, like someone falling over a cliff. Loud enough so that everyone within a hundred yards spun around to see what was happening.

The little girl was standing next to the dead body of Frank Boller, the night security guard.

Not your average murder mystery. A heart pounding story.
