Seeds, by their nature, are easy to move over unlimited distances and easy to store for short or lengthy periods of time. However, they can harbour organisms of quarantine significance such as fungi, bacteria, viruses, nematodes and insects, and can be contaminated by unwanted weed seeds. Well-documented cases recount the spread of devastating pests from one area, country or continent to another. The proceedings presented here focus on the ways and means of containing the spread of quarantine pests through seeds, based on the experiences of previously affected nations.
