Not illustrated. 1841 edition. Excerpt: ... the Borysthenes, supply no other passage but a few defiles, which a very few troops would be sufficient to guard. Farther on, Bobruisk marked out the right of this great line, and orders were given to obtain possession of that fortress. In addition, an insurrection of the populous provinces of the south was calculated on: they would assist Schwartzenberg in expelling Tormasoff, Napoleon's EXPEDITION TO RUSSIA. 165 and the army would be increased by their numerous Cossacks. One of the greatest proprietors of these provinces, a nobleman in whom everything was distinguished, even to his external appearance, hastened to join the liberators of his country. He it was whom the emperor intended for the leader of this insurrection. In this position nothing would be wanting. Courland would support Macdonald; Samogitia, Oudinot; the fertile plains of Glubokoe, the emperor; and the southern provinces would supply the rest. In addition, the grand magazine of the army was at Dantzic; and its intermediate ones were at Wilna and Minsk. In this manner the army would be connected with the country which it had just set free; and all things appertaining to that country, its rivers, marshes, productions, and inhabitants, would be united with us: all things would be combined for the purposes of defence. Such were Napoleon's plans. He was at that time seen exploring Witepsk and its environs, as if preparing here to make a long stay. Establishments of all kinds were formed here. Thirty-six ovens, capable of baking 29,000 pounds of bread at once, were constructed. Neither was utility alone attended to: embellishment was also considered. Some stone houses spoiled the appearance of the square of the palace; the emperor ordered his guard to pull them down, and to clear...
